Dear Secretary Zinke,

I was shocked to learn that the US Fish and Wildlife Service, which sits within your department, has announced plans to lift the United States' ban on the import of elephant trophies from animals hunted and killed in Zimbabwe and Zambia. As a concerned global citizen, and someone who recognizes the critical importance of living elephants to the health of our planet, I urge you to stand against this decision and ensure the ban stays in effect.

African elephants have been under siege for decades, targeted by ivory poachers and legal hunters, and in parts of the continent their numbers have dropped perilously. According to the Great Elephant Census the elephant population dropped by 30% from 2007 to 2014, a loss of 144,000 elephants. Across Zimbabwe it fell 6% and substantial declines have been recorded along the Zambezi River in Zambia.

With the species in decline, every effort must be taken to protect those animals that remain.

A concerted global effort has seen the closure of ivory markets, a decline in elephant poaching and an acceptance that ethical conservation practices, such as photography safaris and wildlife tourism are the way forward. Lifting the ban on the import of elephant trophies is counter-intuitive to all that is being achieved for the species and further stands against the wishes of our great nation. A poll of US citizens revealed that 83% supported the ban on elephant trophies – your country does not wish to be associated with the killing of elephants and I urge you and the administration to respect the wishes of your people and to hear the pleas of the rest of us .

Killing an elephant will not conserve the species and lifting the import ban will act only to encourage hunters to secure permits to kill elephants in the knowledge they can bring their 'trophy' home.

So I ask you again, I implore you, please ensure this critically important ban is not lifted and help keep this protection in place.

Thank you for your time.

Yours sincerely,
